Ahwesh's work supplies a nuanced perspective on the theme of borders, at a time when hot button headlines about borders and immigration feature prominently in mass media. The treatment of these subjects in mainstream news coverage may leave viewers further entrenched in polarized camps; however, Ahwesh's videos take the opposite tack.

Specifically, by adopting a dynamic of unsettling, they refuse any form of entrenchment from the outset.

Significantly, Unsettled States addresses the external cartographic boundaries that delineate national territories, as well as the internal coordinate systems that define personal psychic terrains. Some works in this exhibition, like Kansas Atlas, Border Control, and Re: The Operation, address the borders of nation states and the political, ecological, and humanitarian crises that disrupt them. Others, like She Puppet, The Falling Sky, and The Blackest Sea, operate more existentially, unraveling the comforting confidence of belonging that borders seek to stabilize.

Spanning nearly two decades and diverse visual styles, the exhibition addresses these issues in manifold ways. Ethically, Ahwesh's video works trouble borderlines that violently sever families and communities; politically, their ecofeminist stance destabilizes the seemingly smooth operations of settler colonialism; conceptually, they disrupt territorial logics and structures; figuratively, Ahwesh portrays upheavals in wind and waves; and materially, she references the uncanniness of new technologies that document, simulate, and circulate our own unsettled states.
